Abstract

This study tested the influence of confidence on the Arabic Semester Final Assessment through vocabulary mastery in class X students of MA Walisongo Sukajadi. Highlighting the importance of Arabic language mastery and the affective role of self-confidence, this study aims to analyze the direct and indirect influence of confidence on vocabulary-mediated Arabic PAS. Using a quantitative approach with simple path analysis, 101 students were used as purposive sampling samples. Data were collected from confidence questionnaires, vocabulary tests, and PAS scores. The instrument has been valid and reliable. The results of the analysis showed that confidence did not have a significant effect on vocabulary mastery ($p=0,117$). In addition, neither self-confidence ($p=0,418$) nor vocabulary mastery ($p=0,034$) had a significant influence on Arabic PAS. It was concluded that there was no significant mediation evidence of vocabulary mastery in the relationship between self-
