TITLE: Implementing Mobile-Assisted Data-Driven Vocabulary Learning in EFL Students: Its Effectiveness and Students' Perspectives

ABSTRACT: Data-Driven Learning (DDL) is renowned for its inductive potential way of learning in English learning settings, but its hindrance to the successful implementation has not kept pace with the needs of the digital-native students, particularly for EFL learners. The aim of the study is to explore to what extent MALL integrated into DDL has leveraged learners' vocabulary acquisition and their attitudes towards mobile-assisted data-driven vocabulary learning approach. The results show the participants' learning outcomes have significant variations; on the other hand, the responses collected from the questionnaires reveal that the participants have overall positive attitudes towards mobile-assisted DDL and also are cognizant that mobile-assisted DDL integrated into learning is practically useful to construct their own vocabulary knowledge. The pedagogical implication and limitation are also discussed. More understandings of mobile-assisted DDL research will allow instructors and learners to better harness the power of MALL integrated into DDL to get learners' English learning performance boosted.

MANUSCRIPT DETAILS

TITLE: A mixed-methods investigation of the effectiveness and perceptions of learning English collocations using the keyword method and the rote learning method

ABSTRACT: A controlled laboratory-like setting was adopted for randomly assigning participants to the rote learning method (RLM) group (n=15) or the keyword learning method (KLM) group (n=15). After receiving training on use of the respective strategy, the two participant groups applied the respective strategy to the learning of collocations. Collocations were assessed at three different time periods, and additional data regarding perceptions of the two strategies were elicited through one-on-one post-hoc interviews. The quantitative data revealed the KWM was superior to the RLM in terms of long-term retention of productive collocation knowledge; knowledge of adjective-noun collocations was retained better than verb-noun collocations. The qualitative data revealed that participants deemed the KWM was unfamiliar but effective. Additionally, participants claimed the RLM was facile but may result in a high rate of forgetting. The pedagogical implications are that foreign language teachers should encourage language learners to use the KWM for learning English collocations.
